Cutarra the Parent of Bronchitis and Communition.—The brief, vagae and illogical rhapsodies given of Catarra, by medical writers, do not approach the dignity of Pathology, nortigally claim a niche in the Temple of Mexical Fathology, nortigatly claim a niche in the Temple of Mexical Fathology, nortigatly claim a niche in the Temple of Mexical Fathology, and the practicing physican by those cossay has only served to make darkness more viable. The term Catarra, it is true, finds a place and a passing notice on the pages of Nosological works; but a commonsense theory of it has never yet been given. Without a correct knowledge of the symptoms that clearly define and point set medical for the superior of the Profession, but asserted as a piant common sensus fact, that a disease that has never been uncerstood—never been accurately defined, is necessarily beyond the reach of remedies based upon conjecture and failacy. A distinguished English physician, Dr. Hyde Salter, of London, in a clinical iccture lately delivered before a class in Charles, Grave Hospital, declared that "a reacty for Catarra has sever been dischered."

This paysician unquestionably has ample means of knowing.

don, in a clinical lecture lately derived study of Catarrh Acaseng Gross Hospital, declared that "a reacety for Catarrh Acasenger been disclered."

This physician unquestionably has ample means of knowing all the remedies in the Materia Medica, and the practice of the all the remedies in the Materia Medica, and the practice of the declare that there is no remedy for Catarrh. The undersigned, declare that there is no remedy for Catarrh. The undersigned, declare that there is no remedy for Catarrh. The undersigned, the author of this apostacy from medical orthodoxy—this innovation upon "established practice"—has often and painfully segretted the necessity which impels him to the declaration that nothing from books, or theories, or distinguished practice moders can possibly be gleaned to illuminate the pathway of him who would investigate the origin, cause, character and unof the senseless veroisge of such medical men as deem it only a seasual deviation from general health, through some trivial compisant like a common cold or mid influenza.

Catarrh is a disease per se (of itself). At its highs it is of malignant aspect—calamitous in its ravages, deflant of the efforts of nature for its removal, and if unonecked in its career, attended with great eanger and prolonged suffering.

Assuch it should have a conspicuous place on the historic tabled of Newology, and its origin, cause, occation and character for vill fully und truthfully defined.

Catarrh has been guested to be of two kinds, and so divided: On the well, the other the dry. With cond propriety and models and earlies are defined.

ORIGIN AND LOCATION OF CATARRE.

There is a gland, colled by an atomists the pituitary pland, se ted within the skull, back of and between the eyes. It is very small, and its office or vecation is to recrete a pure and timpid fluid, to be sent down through an appropriate duct, leading into sech nostril, there to indirect the Schneidenan meanurance which contains the offsetory nerves and the sense of assell. When this "pituitary pland" becomes discussed, it Alize a poisoned well. The fluid which it secretes, instead of long pure and healthy, is morbid and vitiated, and no longer fit to perform its important office. It must now extert a baneful and deletious, instead of a salutary influence up in the delicate, sensitive membrane in which is seated the scane of surell. Its active membrane in which is established and pleicase to all the tis-recolous and poisonous character conveys disease to all the tis-

SYMPTOMS OF CATARRE.

When the majady has arrived at its acme, in the progress of devastation, the odor emitted from the morbid, vitiated secration is off-axive to an extent that is almost into-crable. The senses of smell and taste become greatly impaired, and many instances entirely lest. The organs of hearing, particularly the tympenum, become greatly affected, and frequently feasility in permanent deaffices. The seat of the disease being near the leadry and gland, the tears of the eyes are affected, and weakness of sight and partial or total blundness ensues, and weakness of sight and partial or total blundness ensues, and error, is the legitimate of spring of Catarrh, and, unless and error, is the legitimate of spring of Catarrh, and, unless and error, is the legitimate of spring of Catarrh. Such is the correct, though brief, pathelogy of Catar relieved. Consumption is certain to follow.

Such is the correct, though brief, pulliplogy of Catarth.
The reader is now disposed, and certainly has a right, to ask,
"Asyou have repudiated not only all former theories and dogmas as puerile and hypothetic, but also all other remedies hits erto preserbed as insufficient and useless, do pen offer a gonuine, positive and ranical cure for the disease! My answer is unequiveed and without the least reserve! I do. The remedy effered by the is prepared upon medical and philosophical prineiglies, and under the santary asspices and prestige of a knowleage derived from long and seduious investigation.

Being satisfied that to cure the disease the remedial agent must be applied to the location of it, and having witnessed in my own practice, and learned from the experience of the most cament physicians, the impotency of the practice laid down in books, and the deleterious effects from the use of "mufs," the sether was impelled to seek for curative agents beyond preceribed authority.

In this he has been eminently successful, and its results are such as warrant him in saying, unequivocally, that the Remedy he has prepared (which is in fluid form, to be drawn into the nostrilly and offers to the world, will effectually and radically cure Cataryh.

"The poem is unrestrained, and perfectly adapted to the times, showing ne little originality and brilliancy of mind. It will, in truth, establish the writer as a witty and successful poet and satirist. Yet it is so good-natured and graceful that it cannot fail to please; and so tue, that it deserves to find a place on every family table, and will be appreciated by every one of taste, both for its merits as a poem and its eleverness as a satire."

"A capital companion piece to 'Nothing to Wear.' All the men have been buying their wives copies of 'Nothing to Wear.' and now the dear creatures can repay the compliment by pre-senting their brothers and lords with 'Nothing to Do.'"
